Scenario / Query

Scenario: A fourth-generation immigrant

My extended family holds an overnight New Year's vigil at my grandmother's apartment every year. We light candles, tell origin stories, eat simple foods, and keep the night quiet—no music, no alcohol. This year, my favorite DJ is doing a rare rooftop set across town, and close friends already booked a table and planned a tasting menu. I've run on fumes all quarter and crave a night of dancing, rich flavors, and easy laughter that isn't about work or duty. At the same time, my grandmother asked me to lead the midnight toast in our dialect; the last time I did, she cried and said it felt like holding hands with our ancestors. My cousins are counting on me to bring the hand-kneaded bread she taught me to make. Saying yes to the rooftop feels like feeding a part of me that's been starving; saying yes to the vigil feels like guarding a thread that holds us together and gives me a place in a story that outlives me.

Value Relevance Estimator

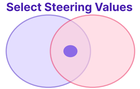

Scenario Active Values

- Hedonism
- Tradition
- Self Direction Action
- Conformity Interpersonal
- Stimulation
- Benevolence Dependability

User Value Profile Rank

1. Benevolence Dependability
2. Achievement
3. Hedonism
4. Power Resources
5. Universalism Nature

Combine / Select Steering Values

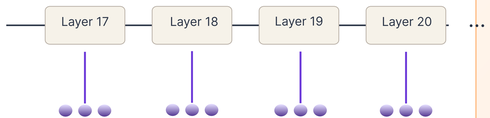

Selected Steering Values

- Benevolence
- Hedonism

Steering Module

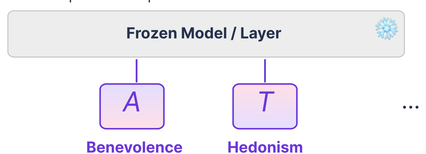

1. Activation Steering

Inject value vector at layers

2. LoRA Adapters

Use value-specific adapters

Output Response

Value-Aligned Response

Imagine how you'd feel if you spent a night dancing with your friends and then went straight to your grandmother's vigil the next day. It would likely feel rushed and might take away from the joy of both nights. But, if you prioritize spending quality time with your loved ones tonight, you can always plan another fun night with friends soon.